Question:

Describe the cause-and-effect relationship in expository writing by writing a paragraph on how poverty and corruption are related to each other.

Poverty and corruption are closely linked in a harmful cycle that can be tough to break. When people live in poverty, they often find it challenging to meet their basic needs like food and shelter. This struggle can lead some individuals to engage in corrupt practices, such as bribery, to gain access to resources or assistance. For instance, they may feel pressured to pay bribes just to receive help or to secure a job. On the flip side, corruption makes poverty even worse. When government officials steal money meant for social programs, it prevents support from reaching those who need it most. This lack of support keeps communities trapped in poverty. As corrupt practices continue, trust in government and institutions declines, leading to further disengagement from civic activities. People may lose hope in their ability to change their situation, making them less likely to challenge the corruption around them. This cycle of poverty and corruption feeds off one another, making it extremely difficult for societies to improve. To make real progress, it is essential to tackle both issues together. By addressing poverty and demanding accountability from those in power, communities can start to break this cycle, creating a better environment where individuals have the chance to thrive and institutions can rebuild trust. Recognizing how these issues are connected is a vital step toward creating lasting change.
